

My dream career is becoming an English teacher. I can see the inspiration that first sparked my interest for this career when I look back at my younger self. I have a strong desire to make my younger self proud, which is why I want to teach English. I always used myself as my main source of motivation to achieve academic and personal success throughout my academic career.

Although my previous teachers encouraged me to follow my goals, the real drive to do so came from inside. I can clearly remember how uninspired and unmotivated several of my classmates seemed to be with English. I couldn't understand why others didn't share my joy for the creativeness found in language and literature, even if I loved it too.

That was the precise moment I decided to change things for the better. I made a commitment to change people's opinions about English and to install in them my enthusiasm and sense of fulfillment for the language. Not only do I want to teach, but I also want to kindle a spark of interest and a respect for the richness of language and literature.

As an English teacher, my goal is to establish a bright, inclusive classroom where each student feels appreciated and free to reach their full potential. In addition to improving my students' lives, I hope that by encouraging a love of English, I can help to mold the next generation of critical thinkers and lifelong learners. I'm devoted to changing my students' lives for the better and pushing them to pursue their own goals and levels of self-awareness with compassion, imagination, and hard work.
